champion road warriors series 1 episode 1 book free downloadComparison of various parameters of reactive oxygen species production by cardiac endothelial cells and cardiomyocytes. To determine whether endothelial cells can serve as a source of reactive oxygen species (ROS) in the pathogenesis of cardiac ischemia-reperfusion (I/R) injury, we compared the production of ROS by porcine heart endothelial cells (PHEC) and cardiomyocytes (HCM) in response to I/R insult. HCM and PHEC were isolated from pig hearts by two different procedures. ROS production by HCM and PHEC was stimulated in vitro with high glucose and hypoxanthine and was assessed using the fluorescent probe hydroethidine (HE). Exposure of HCM to either high glucose alone or high glucose and hypoxanthine increased ROS production 1.6- and 2.1-fold, respectively. Similar patterns were observed in HCM from six pigs (n=12) exposed to I/R (33/12 min) or sham (sham-I/R). Maximal ROS production by PHEC was observed after 3 h of incubation. In cells co-cultured with HCM, ROS production by PHEC was significantly reduced, indicating that PHEC could serve as a source of ROS. However, in cells co-cultured with PHEC, ROS production was markedly decreased in the presence of L-ascorbic acid, indicating a reversible production of ROS by PHEC, likely due to free radical scavenging. Our results suggest that production of ROS by PHEC is lower than that of HCM in vivo and that these cells cannot serve as an important source of ROS in the setting of myocardial I/R injury.IN THE NEWS: Member Spotlight Both CardSue and Fern have been featured in the following media outlets.
